

BDRP Licensing Permission Agreement and Release Information

BDRP requires that all presenters return the Licensing Permission Agreement and Release Form.

If you use material that you did not create yourself and for which you do not hold the copyright or that has been previously published, you must obtain a written copyright release from the copyright holder or owner of this material. Proper attribution for this material must be included in your presentation and, if your presentation is part of an education course, the course book.

This is for your own legal protection as well as that of BDRP and is taken very seriously. Any information included in your slides should be treated as a published work. Any data or image that you would not include in a published article without proper permissions should also not be included in your slides.

More information on copyright can be found on the Copyright Clearance Center website.

Almost all journal articles online have an option for securing copyright permissions through an automated process. Select options for “get rights and content,” “copyright permissions,” etc. The exact wording depends on the publisher.

Why do I need to complete the BDRP license release?

In disseminating information, it is important that BDRP protects the intellectual property rights of others and of BDRP. BDRP claims ownership for materials produced by BDRP, such as a course book, so it is requested that contributors give permission for use of their work and acknowledge that the content of the contributed materials is copyright free or that the contributor has permission to use any materials that are under copyright.

I am a state or federal government employee. What obligations do I have?

Government agencies usually retain a nonexclusive, royalty-free license to publish or reproduce work that is produced by employees, and they permit others to use and publish that work without further licensing or fees. By signing the License Release, you are certifying that BDRP is free to use the material without infringing upon the rights of another entity.

The materials for the presentation were prepared as part of my job. Is it still necessary to complete the form?

Yes. By completing and signing the form, you are confirming that you are authorized by your employer to transfer licensing rights to these materials and that your employer has consented to all the terms and conditions of the agreement.

How do I know if I need copyright permission?

If any material in your presentation is taken directly from another source, you need permission of the author/publisher to use that material. However, if you take data from multiple sources, for example, and create a new table, that is your work, and you would cite the source of the data but would “own” the new work. If an image you created was published and the publisher retained copyright, you could not use that image without a copyright release. However, you could use a similar image you created that had not been previously published.

Is copyright permission needed for images found on the Internet?

Images, website screenshots, photographs, and text derived from Internet sources may be copyrighted and cannot be used without permission and attribution. Some sites do have statements allowing free use, use for educational purposes, or other guidelines. It is important to track the source of material and the use the statement on that site and proceed accordingly. Unless explicitly stated otherwise, the assumption is that materials are copyrighted or were borrowed without attribution/permission. Some materials are in the public domain and may be used freely. For example, US law defines the interval for intellectual property rights on some materials, and once expired, those materials may be used freely.

I am using a photograph of a person. Are there any special cautions?

If the photo is copyrighted, you would follow the appropriate procedures to get permission for use, which may involve a fee. In regard to photos that you own or someone else owns, before BDRP use, you need to secure proof that the person gives permission for the use of their image.
